SiteComments:

A large number of poorly preserved brick, mud and concrete structures, stone wall enclosures and middens are scattered across the Wallmannsthal site. The houses, generally built with clay bricks or stone in square or circular shapes, probably belonged to members of the Wallmannsthal community who resided in the area in the mid-20th century. In addition, material in middens such as glass, metal, enamel, plastic and wood indicate a more recent age for the structures. The sites are probably of limited significance due to the poor preservation of structures, and the apparent recent age of some of the features.
