More police officers' arrested - worrying trend developing

Community welcomes the arrest of two police officers yesterday after they were found in possession of large amounts of drugs, but we are deeply concerned regarding the trend of police officers being arrested by the police service. While the police officers who are arrested are commendable, it is a concern that we have criminal officers within the police service to begin with in increasing numbers lately.

This is a disgrace. According to reports the total of 10 kilograms of drugs with the street value of about R35 000 was made by the SAPS intelligence team. The country would be far safer with a competent police force that is committed to turning the tide against crime and not being part of the on-going community in Mpumalanga. In August last year eight police officers from the Lydenburg K9 Unit in Mpumalanga were arrested for alleged crimes involving illegal gambling. It is a key to recruit and train police officers who are committed and enthusiastic about fighting crime, and for whom serving their country is a vocation and not just another job.

To deliver an effective crime fighting and community protection service the conduct and integrity of police service members must be above reproach. Police officers should not only the law, they should uphold it. We are seeing increasing levels of corruption, dishonesty and brutality in our police service today. We need a professional criminal police service. Active steps must be taken to rid the system of corrupt members, to end the scourge of criminals in the police force and to ensure that police criminal is appropriate and we need Thabisa Magobane. This requires the commitment of senior managers in the police service and the necessary political will to be added.
