Steve Tshwete council retreats after protest

Tariffs increase put on ice after a week of violent uprising

By Mandla Khoza

Violent protests by residents of Middelburg townships have forced the Steve Tshwete local municipality to put its tariffs increases on hold and to also delay the removal of some non-qualifying people from its register of indigents.

Last week the community went on the rampage, barricading roads, setting alight a bus and forcing businesses to shut down in protest against a 3.9% tariff hike for rates.

The council held an urgent meeting on Friday and resolved that the cleansing of the indigent register be put on hold and that the increment in tariffs also be put on hold for 30 days. Those who owe the municipality will be allowed to buy electricity vouchers without having to settle their debts first.

According to the municipality, the auditor-general (AG) had ordered it to fix its indigent register after it appeared that people who did not qualify to be on the register –, such as teachers, police officers and municipal employees who earn more than the threshold

R3,700 – were benefiting unduly.

“Following consultations with communities and other stakeholders regarding municipal accounts concerns, council resolved that residents be allowed to buy electricity for the next 30 days even if their municipal accounts are in arrears.

“In this regard, the municipality appeals to all residents to continue with the payment of their accounts,” said municipal spokesperson, Prudence Magutle. “The council also resolved that only residents who were delisted from the indigent register due to disqualification of letters of authority and incomplete information be reinstated for a period of up to six months while their matters are being reviewed.

“Accounts of these residents will therefore be reviewed from January 2021 to date. And residents who were disqualified due to affordability will not be brought back to the indigent register.”

Magutle said the municipality’s revenue management team will be visiting various wards from today to consult and resolve municipal accounts enquiries brought forward by affected residents.
